Explore the Met's resources for educators during this two-week online interactive forum for elementary school teachers. Participants discuss portraits from various collection areas by viewing objects on the Museum's website and Timeline of Art History, and then create cross-cultural comparisons intended to spark stimulating conversations, art projects, and writing activities with students. Through online discussion and exploration, small group projects, reflective blog entries, as well as hands-on, self-paced artmaking, participants are encouraged to challenge and expand their definitions of portraiture while incorporating Museum resources into their classroom curriculum.

Teachers of grades K–6 as well as elementary art teachers from all geographic areas are encouraged to apply. Participating teachers will be required to log on at least once each day to contribute to the discussion, and several live chat sessions will be scheduled during the course. Participants should expect to spend at least one hour each day during the two-week period (Monday, July 16–Friday, July 27) contributing to the discussion and completing activities, and must have access to a computer and high-speed Internet access during the entire course. A headset with built-in microphone is preferable for live chat sessions, and participants must have a degree of computer proficiency in navigating websites, as well as email and word-processing skills.

At the conclusion of the course, participants will receive a pass to visit the Museum on their own to experience the original works of art in person. Teachers who can travel to New York City are encouraged to attend the in-person tour on July 31. Participants will also receive additional resources both online and by mail, and will receive a certificate of completion for 15 contact hours if they wish to obtain professional development credit with their local school district.
